Una parte dei So, these are the two main social and cultural factors that have influenced the development of the Egyptian book industry. The Cameron Diaz, George Clooney, George Lucas, Clint Eastwood and Amy Adams are among a number of people who have spoken out after Quentin Tarantino sparked a storm of controversy by comparing the Oscar race to a "who's black?" quiz. However, Diaz said she did not see the humour in the comment, which was made during an interview with Ryan Seacrest on Thursday. "It's a very tough thing to say and I take offence to it because we have some of the best, most talented, most talented people in the world in this industry," Diaz told Access Hollywood. "I think it's so unfortunate that someone has to say something like that. I think he could have chosen his words differently." It is not the first time Tarantino has been accused of cultural insensitivity. At the Golden Globes last month, he said Leonardo DiCaprio had a "boyish quality" and that his Golden Globe win for best actor was "like a black man being given the Nobel peace prize for something that has nothing to do with peacemaking". Diaz is currently nominated for best supporting actress at the Oscars for her role in the movie "Shutter Island". In 2007, she won a Golden Globe for her role in "There's Something About Mary". Asked about her Golden Globes win, Diaz said: "I'm just going to go home, drink some wine and give the speech to George Clooney." George Lucas, who directed the classic film "Star Wars", also branded the comments "distasteful" and said the issue had "been one of my causes for the last three years". "It's one of those things that's been bothering me a lot," he told Entertainment Weekly. "It
