Last week, we learned that Dave Eggers and Chronicle Books had teamed up to release Paul Auster's City of Glass. Auster's book is reportedly based on the graphic novels and graphic novel project he produced, illustrated by Catherine Johnson, from 2004 to 2008. Advertisement Now, The New York Times is reporting that Auster and Chronicle Books will be bringing an illustrated version of the book to the form of a hardcover, coffee table book. While most of the illustrations are Johnson's, some will be by illustrator Shaun Tan, the artist who contributed to Johnson's The Golden Compass. Auster will also be writing the book's text, which will in turn will be illustrated. Advertisement

You may recognize Auster's name here for his novel The New York Trilogy, one of the novels that inspired this year's Relativity Media film Beautiful Boy. While that novel was initially a personal story—Auster was inspired to write the story after he watched his brother Matt from the news shortly after his release from prison—the book has an element of fiction that ties together the inspirations behind Auster's novel. However, the project is behind The New York Trilogy. And with his new hardcover (or coffee table book), Auster is dedicating a portion of the book to "the people who were instrumental in my becoming a writer." I'd very much like to see the rest of the people who helped him in some of his other books get at least the mention as well. The New York Times has the same review of Auster's book as it did for Chronicle Books' graphic novel adaptation: The genius of Auster's book is that he "combines a literary tradition that has deep roots in the imaginations of the early modernist writers in Europe, and a visual tradition of illustration and comic books, and shows us how a compelling story told through these two distinct forms can be combined into a seamless whole."
