ChingLiu found this hilarious. A: Top post is updated with working link! If it's not updated on your end, maybe try again later :) Many consumers have purchased fitness trackers and smartwatches and other portable consumer devices to help them track their physical activity. Most often these portable devices are worn on the user's wrist and can display alerts to remind the user to take a walk or engage in some other type of physical activity. These devices and alerts may be most effective at increasing the rate of physical activity. Many devices are available for tracking calorie intake, including tablets, smartphones, and other portable electronic devices. These devices can display alerts to encourage the user to choose healthier food or to consume fewer calories. However, the calories consumed often do not correspond to the number of calories consumed or the amount of physical activity performed, which may result in the user eating more than required or inactivity. The amount of exercise or physical activity performed is often estimated by the user and/or recorded by the device when the user engages in physical activity. However, the user or the device may not accurately estimate the amount of physical activity that they performed and the amount of physical activity that they will perform during the next day, week or month. Thus, there is a need for improved methods and systems for monitoring physical activity.
