Streaming audio is an exciting, emerging medium, but it is also daunting and time consuming. Streaming audio may be transmitted over the Internet, as a user plays a radio station, television channel, or internet video. This creates a challenge in playback. How do you accurately replay a streaming audio piece exactly as it was heard when the listener hears it for the first time, or on subsequent iterations. This challenge has created numerous troubleshooting efforts and many users, engineers, and developers are now having to work much harder to achieve and maintain the level of success. Many streaming audio methods are currently available to do this but they are all fraught with their own challenges, including that of third-party intervention. Audio Player First is an audio player

If you missed it, you can see all the pieces from that show below. This is the first time I've made a piece like this, so I was very happy with how it came out. It's shaped to mimic a lobster's claw and needs a lobster inside to fill it out. If you ever wanted to try making one of these yourself, here's a quick tutorial. Here's the finished Lobster. I felt like I was close to finishing the piece, but had to make a couple tweaks to the piece in the end. I'm glad I did though, and it reminds me to keep pushing myself when creating. I also made another version of the piece as a night-time version. It's wired up to LED wall lights, and is now on display in the front lobby of Edgewater. I just got back from Boston, where I have a show at Bob Stulman Fine Art, which opens tomorrow and runs until Aug. 12. There will be some of my work in there as well, including 3 pieces I've made since I last blogged. My work has been featured on the NPR and PBS All Things Considered 09e8f5149f

As an example, when you say something like, "Zack" at your normal speaking speed, the synthesizer should be able to distinguish the word "Zack" from other words, even the word "Zack". However, the recognition is sometimes incorrectly outputting sounds that are close to "Zack". One thing that can cause this problem is a synthesizer's inability to distinguish a word from other words. To combat this problem, we have developed a program that let's the synthesizer input the same audio file and determine the underlying sound of the audio file.
