We all know that the quality of a website is measured by the user experience of the website, but quality websites can still be easily affected by inconsistencies in how images are positioned and formatted on a page. While no particular websites are built to throw a wrench in your code, there are a few tricks you can use to adjust and optimize an image's position and formatting. You'll also need to adjust the positioning of the image for desktop and mobile device as well as tablet-based design. Laying Out and Positioning Images In order to lay out an image, the first step is to determine its positioning on a page. This will determine where in the code we need to go to adjust the code. We need to know what we're adjusting and what kind of code we're actually modifying. The first thing we need to know is that a CSS property for an image will be placed before a property for an object. We also need to know whether or not the image is set to display: none. With this information in mind, we can begin creating our code. Note: you'll want to be aware that not all browsers support the same CSS properties for an image. For example, the CSS property `transform: scale(n);` doesn't work in the majority of browsers, and won't work on mobile devices. For this reason, we need to adjust how we adjust our images if they are set to `display: none`. It's important to note that there are a variety of devices that will display an image on a mobile device, which makes it impossible to target a device-specific code to an image. This means we need to modify how we write our code to deal with images for mobile devices as well. After we have positioned the image properly on the page, it is a good idea to optimize
