We investigated the proportion of child deaths occurring in outlying communities and within women who delivered outside health facilities, and the association of this outlier phenomenon with differences in content and quality of maternal and newborn care and timing of delivery in these communities. We surveyed (2001 and 2003) four typical rural Tanzanian villages in the Nyamisati (Pwani region) and 3 Mchinji (Madaraka region) districts by using a new modified population-based household survey that incorporated a women's survey. The study population included all women with a live birth during the 4 months preceding the survey and their children whose deaths had been reported during the 1 year before the survey. Among women with a live birth, 1,588 women with a living child (85%) or stillbirth (15%) were identified. The median number of women sampled from each village was 151 (range, 85-500). In the 2004 maternal survey, 82% of all women in the sampled villages reported delivering their last child within a health facility. The rate of newborn deaths in outlying communities was 23/1,000 live births, and maternal morbidity and mortality were high (12% and 11%, respectively). These estimates of neonatal and maternal mortality were more than twice the rates observed in the 10 highest-resource villages surveyed. Within outlying communities, the odds of a newborn baby dying were seven times greater for neonatal deaths than for death before 72 hours of age (odds ratio, 6.8; 95% CI, 3.8-12.3). The odds of a woman giving birth to a stillborn or newborn dying were three times higher (odds ratio, 3.1; 95% CI, 2.3-4.4) in outlying communities than in high-resource areas. Timing of delivery did not independently influence neonatal mortality, but differences in maternal care were associated with a three-fold greater neonatal mortality rate in outlying communities (odds ratio, 3.2; 95% CI, 1.7-5.9). Outlier communities in Tanzania had severe maternal morbidity and mortality rates and neonatal mortality rates that were not only higher than the national rate but also twice that of the 10 highest-resource areas.
